Horlicks is a popular malted milk drink by brothers James and William Horlicks. James Horlicks studied pharmacy in England, where he developed (16) a wheat and malt-based nutritional drink for infants. Physicians endorsed (17) it for infants and patients with digestive problems. His brother persuaded him to market his idea in the United States. As a result, both of them started a company to manufacture the malted drink.

During the Second World War, Horlicks tablets were used as an energy-booster for soldiers. As a non-perishable and high-calorie food supplement, Horlicks was considered suitable (18) for emergency packs. Therefore, scientists began taking it on expeditions (19) to the Polar regions.

It is believed that drinking Horlicks may assist sleep, but such a claim has been difficult to prove. As the Horlicks brand grew, the brothers decided to sell their company. Later, it was acquired (20) by a company called the Beecham Group. The factory in England now produces about 13 million kilogrammes of Horlicks powder each year. For 140 years, Horlicks reigns as one of the top beverages in England.

Read the passage below and answer questions 71 to 80. (20 marks)

The sun shone fiercely down on Madam Wong as she wiped her perspiration with her gold-embroidered, pink silken handkerchief. The streets were bustling with activity, mainly because everyone was busy stocking up on supplies ahead of the rumoured price-hike. Some British official apparently leaked out information that Singapore was the next target for the Japanese, causing a huge frenzy amongst the locals.

Seeing that the wet market was thoroughly packed with haggling citizens and voracious traders, Madam Wong decided to get her groceries at another market, one recommended by her fellow mahjong enthusiasts.

"Excuse me, can you please take me to River Valley instead?" asked Madam Wong.

The rickshaw man rolled his eyes in annoyance as he skilfully towed his carriage with one hand while using the other to wipe his perspiration with the towel hung round his neck.

"Don't worry, I'll pay double. I know it's a hot day," promised Madam Wong. The rickshaw suddenly accelerated - spurred by the invisible whip of money.

The route to the market was filled with shop houses and Madam Wong noticed the smell of joss sticks and incense paper billowing in the gentle breeze. People were also seen looking up to the heavens and praying. It was a form of spiritual deterrence against the samurais. Many knew that the Japanese invasion was inevitable since most of Malaya had already been conquered. There was nothing that they could do to stop the sword-wielding monsters. Praying for a divine intervention seemed like the only way out.

The rickshaw sped past many food stalls and Madam Wong masked her mouth with her moist handkerchief. Suddenly, her eyes latched onto something. "Stop!" cried Madam Wong. The rickshaw pulled to an abrupt halt and a gentle sandstorm swirled at the ankles of the rickshaw man. Madam Wong reached into her purse while still looking at the particular object and placed five dollars into the sweaty palms of the rickshaw man.

The man's jaw dropped at the sight of the money – he never would have made that much in a day, much less an afternoon. He gratefully scrambled into the shade as Madam Wong walked towards an old woman. She hid behind a pillar and observed the old woman sitting on a splintered wooden stool, trying to keep awake while selling *chou tofu. Madam Wong shook her head in disbelief and ran off, leaving behind her a trail of cold sweat.

Master Wong returned home to the sight of a packet dinner. He ranted at his servant for not doing the grocery shopping and she willingly endured his verbal lashing. Madam Wong came down the stairs upon hearing the din.

"Wong, don't lecture her anymore. It's my fault," interrupted Madam Wong.

Master Wong was puzzled by his wife's comment but in an attempt to save face, he turned to the servant and sternly warned her never to forget the daily groceries. Madam Wong, looking pale as a sheet, signalled to her husband to attend to her.

chou tofu* – usually known as "stinky tofu", a popular Chinese snack

The couple made their way into the study and Madam Wong peered out to make sure that nobody was around before she slammed the door shut. "Wong! I saw her today!" screeched Madam Wong.

"Who?"

"Your mother!"

"What? Impossible. She's dead!"
