It is natural for parents to be protective over their children and make sure they are safe and healthy. However, constantly keeping tabs on (16) them may be a great leap backwards in the minefield of parenting. If parents make countless attempts to remove obstacles (17) in their children's path or try to ensure that their little ones will never experience pain, disappointment or discomfort, they are actually doing them more harm than good.

Studies have shown that children who have domineering (18) parents grow up feeling less competent in dealing with the stresses of life and lack a sense of confidence compared to people of the same age (19) who were not parented this way. Their ability to develop into resilient and independent adults may have been stunted by this act of helicopter parenting, which is characterised by a tendency to hover over their children and swoop in to rescue them at the slightest sign of distress. (20)

Ideally, there must be a balance between being involved and responding accordingly. The better approach is to let the child make mistakes, struggle, experience the consequences and solve problems on his or her own.

Biodiversity is defined as the variety of plant and animal life in the world or a particular habitat. It can be studied on many levels. (29) _____ the highest level, you can look at all the different species (30) _____ the Earth. On a much smaller scale, you can study biodiversity in a pond ecosystem or a neighbourhood park. Identifying (31) _____ understanding the relationships between all the life on Earth are some of the greatest challenges in science.

(32) _____ people recognise biodiversity by species. Examples of species include blue whales, white-tailed deer, white pine trees, sunflowers and microscopic bacteria that you cannot even see with your eye. Biodiversity includes the full range (33) _____ species that live in an area.

Let us look at the species biodiversity in a local pond. At first glance, we (34) _____ identify different plants, including cattails and water lilies. (35) _____ we wait a while, we may be able to spot a garter snake, a bullfrog or maybe a red-winged blackbird. With a closer look, you can see invertebrates and worms (36) _____ leaves, on grasses and in the pond water.

Downloaded from SingaKids.com

If you think you are done, you have not even scratched the surface of the biodiversity within the pond! Using a microscope, you will be able to see hundreds (37) _____ even thousands of different bacteria that inhabit the pond water. They are all part of the species biodiversity of (38) _____ small ecosystem! However, species diversity is only one part of biodiversity. To properly catalogue all the life on Earth is a mammoth task.

Section I : Comprehension -Open-ended (20 marks)

Read the following passage and answer questions 71 to 80.

This kind of getting lost does not happen anymore. I would have a GPS with me now. However, two decades ago at Camp Leaky, an orang utan research camp on Borneo inside Tanjung Puting, the rainforest was an unknowable place. I had been trying to find the maroon leaf monkey as I was a fan of primates. On one of these days, after four hours of following marked trails, I thought I saw one. I risked it and went off the trail.

Forty-five minutes later, I was still wandering, with no maroon monkey in sight. I assumed the trail had to pick up somewhere near where I was, so I used my compass to make a guess. Another thirty minutes later, I was not having any breakthrough. I was not panicking, but I was definitely a little nervous. I had a headlamp, so I was somewhat prepared, but darkness was coming on quickly and finding my way back was only going to get more difficult. There was much to admire, though. Off trail, humans had not disturbed these parts of the rainforest yet. I was rather glad my little mishap could lead me to such beauty. At one point, I saw a shimmering metallic blue pool in an opening. I moved closer. Just beside an oak tree facing a pond were hundreds of butterflies moving their wings. In a second, what I saw in their place was a sea of elephant faeces that had so fascinated them moments before.

Finally, when I was done sightseeing, I decided to pick south on the compass. I figured I would eventually hit the river, if not, a trail first. It paid off. After about twenty minutes, I saw an unmarked trail. Seconds later, I heard a rustling. At first, I was terrified. Here I was all alone in the middle of a dense forest and I certainly did not want to be mauled by some wild animal. I shone my headlamp where I thought the sound was coming from. It was an orang utan. The face was familiar. It was one of the tribes being rehabilitated at camp. I set my heart at ease when I saw her.

The orang utan and I looked at each other and she held out her hand to me. Then she led me, hand clasped in hand, to camp. Just like me, she was heading back for the evening.
