A generation of music lovers are damaging their hearing with audio players that emit dangerously high noise levels. Many young people are at risk of worsening (16) hearing loss, listening regularly to loud music through their headphones over their devices. World Health Organisation (WHO) is urging manufacturers and regulators to ensure smartphones and audio players have software that can help limit (17) people from listening to music too loud for too long.

It is proposed that certain features like automatic volume reduction and parental control of the volume are introduced so that when one goes over (18) the sound limit, the device will automatically reduce (19) the volume to a level which is not going to harm the ears. The effort through this standard is really to empower the user to make the right listening choice. WHO is also looking at volume levels in places such as clubs and sports arenas (20). It aims to develop a regulatory framework for the different venues, which often have very high levels of sound being played over a long period of time. There is a need to protect the people working in such establishments too.

Read the passage below and answer questions 71 to 81. (20 marks)

Mrs Packletide was a wealthy lady who lived in a fashionable part of London, England in 1938. She loved to travel to exotic places like Africa, China, India and Egypt in search of adventures. She loved it even more when she shared with all her friends in London her experiences when she returned.

Now imagine her feelings when her equally fashionable neighbour, Loona Bimberton, held her audience captive with her account of her travels in a private airplane with an Algerian pilot. This was the compelling motive for Mrs Packletide's sudden decision to shoot a tiger. She made up her mind that nothing less than a personally-acquired tiger-skin would satisfy her desire to beat Loona Bimberton in her exciting travelling experiences.

Mrs Packletide paid some villagers in India a thousand rupees to organise the tiger hunt. The great night arrived, moonlit and cloudless. Mrs Packletide crouched on the platform that the villagers had built on a tree, with her rifle. Beside her was her newly employed assistant, Miss Mebbin. A goat was tied to a tree nearby.

"I suppose we are in some danger?" asked Miss Mebbin.

"Nonsense," replied Mrs Packletide. "It's a very old tiger. It can't spring up here even if it wants to."

At that moment, the tiger appeared and ambled towards the goat that was tied to the tree. "Now! Now!" urged Miss Mebbin anxiously. The rifle flashed with a loud sound, and the beast sprang to one side and rolled over in the stillness of death. The goat also lay dead beside it. The villagers rushed forward to check on the tiger while Miss Mebbin pointed to the bullet wound on the goat. One of the villagers exclaimed, "The old tiger had died of a heart attack!" Mrs Packletide was annoyed at the discovery but still, she was pleased to be the possessor of a dead tiger.

Back in England, Mrs Packletide threw a big party so that all her friends and neighbours, including Loona Bimberton, could admire her tiger-skin rug and hear her account of the tiger hunt. She smiled delightfully as her guests praised her bravery. They marveled at her fearlessness as they hung on to her every word, not wishing to miss any details.

"It will be amusing if they knew what really happened," said Miss Mebbin with a laugh.

"Surely you won't give me away, Miss Mebbin?" Mrs Packletide said sheepishly.

"I've seen a house that I will like to buy," replied Miss Mebbin. "It is quite a bargain but I don't have the money."

Miss Mebbin now lives in her pretty house which is the wonder and admiration of her friends. When asked if she had plans for another hunt, Mrs Packletide whispered, "The incidental expenses are too heavy!"
