I have many trophies. However, this particular trophy reminds me of how my mother's encouragement had gotten me to where I am today.
(16)

"You can do it! I know you can!" my mother cheered me up as I paced the stage in anxiety. I could not help but return her a weak smile. As I introduced myself to the judges, I spoke with pauses. Slowly breathing in and out, I closed my eyes and started singing. As I sang, I could hear murmurs from the crowd and the judges. Every now and then, I opened my eyes to peek at the audience. I also looked at my mother. She was fully engrossed in my singing.
(17)
(18)

After the song, there was complete silence. Suddenly, a roaring applause (19)
thundered across the whole auditorium. My heart raced as a little hope sparked inside me. I looked at the judges. They were wide-eyed with amazement.

"Wow..." one of them finally said. I heaved a sigh of relief. I walked down the stage confidently, knowing that the judges were impressed with my performance.

E-scooters may be fun, but are they safe? You might have experiansed a couple of close shaves with death during avoiding e-scooters zipping past you over the sidewalk.

(40) [ ] (41) [ ]

Thus, e-scooters are not really safe.

(42) [ ]

In recent years, e-scooters have swarmed Singapore's streets, bring along with them

(43) [ ]

a wave of scooter-related injurees and even deaths. Each week, about three accidents involving e-scooters but other personal mobility devices (PMDs) happen in Singapore.

(44) [ ]

(45) [ ]

That is definitely way too much.

(46) [ ]

So why is e-scooters considered dangerous? Even at the e-scooter's legal speed limit of 10km/h on footpaths, a colesion with an e-scooter creates a dangerous amount

(47) [ ]

(48) [ ]

of force. A pedastrain who is hit by the device could be very seriously wounded or even

(49) [ ]

die from the impact – with the elderly and young children being perticulerly at risk.

(50) [ ]

There is a high chance of a crash ocuring when a rider fails to slow down in time. This is because it takes time for e-scooters to slow down and come to a stop.

Read the passage below and answer questions 71 to 80. (20 marks)

Seng thought of his son as he pedalled his trishaw. The child loved to paint but Seng could not afford to buy him even a box of paints. He knew that a box of paints would make his son very happy and even help him to become a great painter. He had been eyeing the box of paints in a particular shop.

Later that evening, the covered sidewalk leading to the shop was finally deserted. Seng quickly pedalled down the lane and parked his trishaw in the shadows. He could easily jump onto it and vanish once the mission had been accomplished. He picked up a stone and wrapped it in his handkerchief. His hands were trembling and his body had broken out into cold sweat.

The night was cool but his face was beaded with moisture. Perspiration trickled down his soiled shirt. Heavy with anxiety and coupled with a tinge of guilt, he walked cautiously back along the lane, turned the corner and stepped onto the sidewalk. The time had come.

There was no one around. Holding on tighter to the stone clenched in his right hand, Seng walked past the stationery shop, keeping close to the unlit window. Now he was in full view of the stationery in the display window, especially the paint-box with the street light shining down upon it. He gripped the stone. The muscles of his right arm tightened and swelled. He drew it slowly backwards as if he was ready to throw the stone. However, it did not leave his hand.

His throat began to feel swollen and he felt he was choking. The arm would no longer obey his will. He seemed to be paralysed. Why so? He had wanted that box of paints so badly for his son. This was the opportunity he had been waiting for but he could not go ahead with his plan. Suddenly, the shrill sound of a fire engine shattered the sleeping sidewalk into action. From the shop houses, heads appeared and voices called. The shop owners who lived in the shop houses had been awakened. The sound of the fire engine filled their ears. Then, it was gone as quickly as it had appeared. The fire engine tore down the street at lightning speed, leaving the helpless sobbing figure behind. The stone was still clutched in his nerveless fingers.

He hung his head low as he pedalled miserably towards home, feeling disappointed. He had wanted very much to get that box of paints for his child but he had failed. Suddenly, a thought struck him. "I've not failed. Indeed, I have made my son proud," he whispered to himself.

He realised that he had almost become a thief in his desire to see his son as a great painter. However, his judgement and conscience had not allowed it. The tinge of guilt which had gripped him earlier seemed to have vanished into thin air. He felt calm now and was at peace with himself. He understood that he might not have been able to buy his son that box of paints but at least, his child could honour him as a father. He slept soundly that night.
