Section C: Comprehension 1 (8 marks)

Read the passage carefully and answer questions 17 - 23.

A chou chou is a bolster handmade by grandmothers. It is filled with dried bean sprout husks and given as a gift to a newborn grandchild so that he or she does not get startled while sleeping. While most children need to be read a bedtime story before they go to bed, I only need my chou chou to go to sleep.

A chou chou, which translates to "smelly" in Mandarin, is a comfort object or something personal which one might have since they were young. The thought of not washing a smelly bolster for days or months may seem disgusting for some but comforting for me. My grandmother handmade my chou chou and gave it to me when I was born. I can still remember my first overnight stay during the Primary Three camp held in school. I had packed my chou chou with me and when I took it out during bedtime, my friends teased me relentlessly. I was embarrassed and my face went beet red.

When I was younger, I needed to smell my chou chou before going to sleep every night, or else I would cry loudly and kick up a fuss. The chou chou seems so small now in my hands but it reminds me that the simplest of gifts come from the heart.

Section G: Open-ended Comprehension (10 marks)

Read the passage carefully and answer questions 40 - 48.

Hawker centres in Singapore are known as community dining rooms. They are where Singaporeans of different races and backgrounds come together to enjoy an affordable plate of satay, chicken rice or roti prata.

It is not easy to find seats at the more popular hawker centres during peak hours so it is common for strangers to share tables. Hawker food is so cheap and delicious that eating out is more common than eating at home for many Singaporeans.

A hawker's job is often backbreaking. Hawkers have to work long hours every day, even on weekends. They are often up and about during the early hours of the day, preparing ingredients tirelessly in hot and confined spaces. Imagine being cramped into a small space surrounded by heated gas stoves all day. They usually have to work into the night to catch the dinner crowd. They have no earnings when they are sick or choose to take leave due to personal affairs.

Many hawkers of the older generation have retired, taking their cooking skills with them. To preserve the hawker culture, more help needs to be provided for those who want to take up the hawker trade. However, not many young Singaporeans aspire to be hawkers. These young Singaporeans think that a hawker does not earn much. They realised the job involves a lot of physical labour.

With better support from government organisations, a small community of passionate young Singaporeans have become hawkers. We should respect them for taking up the hard work that comes with the job. Their tireless efforts have allowed us to enjoy our favourite hawker food. They should also be applauded for their resilience.
