Long ago in Southern China, there lived a farmer. As he aged, the frail (16) old man went to live with his son, daughter-in-law and their little boy. The elderly man's trembling (17) hands, blurred eyesight and faltering steps made even the simplest tasks rather difficult for him. Instead of showing love and care for the old man, the old man's son and daughter-in-law scolded him often.

Once, while trying to hold (18) his glass of milk, the old man accidentally spilled it on the tablecloth. Seeing the mess on the table, his son and daughter-in-law became irked (19). They berated the old man so harshly that a sad tear rolled down his cheek. They hardly (20) spoke to him. The only words the young couple had for him were criticisms whenever he made a mistake.

Their little boy, having observed everything, decided to speak up one day.

One afternoon, Mary noticed the canary sitting motionless on his perch. "Is Sir Gallant sick?" she asked in alarm. "No. It is just a dark day outside," her mother reassured her. "It will be raining soon and he probably does not feel like singing."

The two younger children accepted this explanation but not Rachel. She knew that while Sir Gallant stopped singing from time to time, he had always hopped about his cage. She went to the door and looked outside. It was deathly quiet. She saw the outline of her father with the two oxen in the field and at the same time she saw black thunderclouds stacked high into the sky. There was a heaviness in the air and a prickly feeling ran down her spine.

Rachel had bought the canary from the Indian. His words echoed in her mind. "It listens to the wind."

Rachel thought about Sir Gallant's odd behaviour, the angry thunderclouds and how strange it felt. Just then, she caught a faint rumbling of the thunder. Realisation hit Rachel. "Mother!" she shouted. "It's a tornado!"

Immediately, their mother gathered them up and, along with Sir Gallant, rushed outside. The safest place was the *cellar at the side of the house. Throwing open the cellar doors, Mother yelled to Rachel to warn her father.

Rachel took off running across the field shouting and waving her arms, but not until she was halfway across did she get his attention.

"What's wrong?" he yelled.
It was another moment before she reached him. "Tornado!"

His eyes searched the horizon. "I don't see anything, but I can bring in the oxen anyway. I'll come back to the house when I'm done."

"No! There's no time. Listen!" Rachel yelled in hysteria.

The tornado was getting nearer. Finally able to hear the rumbling, Father jumped into action. Releasing the yoke from the harnesses on the oxen, he turned them free. He grabbed Rachel's arm and they began to run. By the time they reached the cellar, the tornado was clearly visible. Rain drenched their bodies and a thunderous roaring pounded the air.

The tornado lasted only minutes although it felt like hours. When the family emerged from their shelter, they were relieved to find their house intact. Fortunately the oxen, too, had escaped although the scarred earth proved the field had been in the centre of the tornado's path. The loss of crops would make things more difficult, but they felt blessed to be alive. They also felt divine intervention had come in the form of a little yellow bird.

A room below ground level in a house, often used for storing food and/or other household items.*
