Kublai Khan, a Mongolian general and statesman, was the grandson and greatest successor of Genghis Khan. (1) _____ the fifth emperor of the Yuan or Mongol dynasty, he completed the conquest of China started by his grandfather in 1211 and thus became the first Yuan ruler (2) _____ the whole of China. (3) _____ the same time, Kublai was the overlord of all the other Mongol lands, which included areas in southern Russia, Persia and the heartlands (4) _____ Mongol princes were still living the traditional nomadic life.

The Mongols (5) _____ a nomadic power. Except (6) _____ some organised hunting and the management of their herds, they had little knowledge about trading. (7) _____ they had almost no experience in the management of public affairs prior to the establishment of the Yuan, they relied heavily on their foreign advisers.

The Mongols' limited knowledge and ability to manage an empire contributed to the relatively rapid collapse of the Yuan dynasty (8) _____ lasted less than a century. With a few outstanding exceptions, such as Kublai himself, (9) _____ the Mongols always called the "Wise Khan", the rulers of the Mongols seem to have looked on power as something to be exploited for immediate gain. The final years of the Yuan dynasty were marked (10) _____ struggle, famine, and bitterness. Hence, it is no surprise that the Yuan emperors who followed after Kublai lost their influence which led to the decline of the Yuan dynasty.

Read the passage carefully and answer the questions that follow. (20 marks)

Standing at the door tentatively, ten-year-old Greg realised it was open and he let himself in. A few days earlier, Greg had noticed with great curiosity that the door on the ground floor of the apartment block opposite his home was now slightly ajar. This apartment block had been abandoned for months with the front door boarded over.

It was dark inside except for the dim light that filtered through the windows from the street lamps. Making out a sofa at the far end of the room, he walked over and sat down. For a moment, Greg thought he heard something that sounded like scraping against the wall. He listened carefully, but it was gone. Greg thought he heard the noise again. He stood up quickly. His stomach tightened and his heart beat faster as he held himself still and listened intently. The scraping noise had stopped, but he was sure he had heard something in the darkness – something breathing!

"Who are you?" came a voice in the darkness. "I'm Greg Ridley," whispered Greg, hardly recognising his own voice. "Who are you?" Greg asked, plucking up his courage. "I'm Lemon Brown," came the answer.

Lemon Brown peered forward and Greg could now finally see him clearly. He was an old man. He had a halo of crinkly white hair that seemed to separate his head from the layers of filthy coats piled on his small body. Greg relaxed. He had seen him before, picking through the trash at the corner and knew he had nothing to fear.

"You aren't here to swipe my treasure, are you?" asked Lemon Brown, squinting one eye as he looked at Greg. "I'm not looking for your treasure," Greg answered smiling. "If you have one." "What do you mean, if I have one," Lemon Brown retorted. "Every man has a treasure. If you don't know that, you must be a fool!" "Sure," Greg responded, not quite understanding what the old man meant. "What do you have? Gold coins?" "Never mind about what I have. Have you heard of me?" asked Lemon Brown. Greg shook his head slowly.

"What happened to you? Why do you live here?" asked Greg. "Hard times, Greg. Hard times caught up with me. I didn't always live here though. A long time ago, I was a musician and everyone wanted to hear me sing. They paid me well too. One day I fell sick and so I lost my job. Before I knew it, my savings were gone. I was old and all alone. All I have left is my memory of the times when I was on stage performing."

"Hey, Old Man! Are you in there? Throw down your money! We know you got that treasure," came a voice breaking the stillness of the night.

Greg crept to the window and peeking out, he saw three older teenagers at the same front door. They were well-known thugs in the neighbourhood. He gestured to Lemon Brown, who moved quietly across the room to the window. The old man looked out, then beckoned frantically for Greg to follow him. For a moment Greg could not move. Then Greg felt Lemon Brown's hand on his arm, pulling him down as they crouched in the darkness. They waited for such a long time that Greg started to doze off. Finally, Lemon Brown stood up. "I think they have gone," said Lemon Brown.

"They were talking about treasure," Greg said. "You really have a treasure?" "What did I tell you? Didn't I tell you every man has a treasure?" Lemon Brown said. "Do you want to see it?"

Greg nodded enthusiastically, wondering what kind of treasure this old man had. Lemon Brown sat on the ground and untied the strings that held the rags on his right leg. When he took the rags away, Greg saw a piece of plastic. The old man carefully took off the plastic and unfolded it, revealing a battered harmonica and some newspaper clippings.

"Here it is," he said, nodding his head. Greg looked at the clippings which told of Lemon Brown, a jazz singer and harmonica player who was appearing in different theatres. One of the clippings said that he had been the star of the show. Greg looked at the harmonica which was badly dented. It was then that he finally understood what the treasure was, and how priceless it was to Lemon Brown.
