When I was a child, my father and I raided the shed for glass jars and filled them with varying amounts of water to make our own musical instrument. For me, it was the start of a lifelong love (16) for science; yet I did not go on to become a scientist.

We need scientists more than ever, not least to work out how to tackle (17) the effects of climate change. Yet like me, many children who first (18) show an interest in science are turning down (19) the subject at school. Why is this and what can we do about it?

I believe that children are natural-born scientists. They have curious (20) minds, love to explore and ask many questions. We need a way to keep children excited about learning and discovering. Only then will we be able to nurture the next generation of scientists.

Refer to the passage below when you answer questions 71 to 80 in Booklet B.

"You didn't put on sunscreen? How many times have I told you..." Mother nagged.

"Chill, Mum, see? Hat," Mei assured as she lifted the red baseball cap on her head.

"So you've got some protection for your face. But what about your body?" Mother continued.

"Mum, it's already late afternoon. There are shadows of trees and buildings around," Mei protested.

"You keep to the main roads. Do you understand? It's safer," Mother cautioned.

"Yes, Madam," Mei replied as she shut the metal gate behind her and jogged in long strides down the street. At the T-junction, Mei deliberately turned left, instead of right. Mother might think the main road was a safer route to jog as it was in plain sight of many people but who would want to run amidst traffic stress and breathe in exhaust fumes? No, the best way to unwind was to follow the old back road.

The moment Mei stepped onto the narrow two-lane road that cars rarely frequented, she entered a different realm, surrounded by trees and shrubs. The air was cooler and fresher to breathe. Panting softly, Mei started to pick up the pace. The only sounds Mei could hear were chirping crickets and birds. It was her favourite jogging route. Mei began to forget the pressure of school and an overprotective mother. With each stride forward, the frown on her forehead gradually melted away.

Suddenly, the bushes next to her rustled and some branches snapped. She froze in mid-stride. Something moved amongst the bushes, breaking branches. The back of her neck tingled, her muscles tensed up...

The next moment, three mongrels* emerged from the bushes. Their overgrown claws struck the road as their skinny ribs heaved. The first thing they sensed was a human, just metres away. The three ferocious dogs pushed forth, one menacing step at a time, growling and flashing their sharp white teeth.

"Where did they come from? Mum was right! How can I get out of this?" Instinctively, Mei took a few steps back. At that moment, she heard the welcome sound of a vehicle approaching from behind her. Her eyes still fixed on the dogs as she sensed the car halting. The mongrels growled even deeper and meaner in response to the appearance of this new beast.

Then, the car door clicked open.

"Careful, slowly back away and get in," the driver calmly said. Mei did as instructed, retreating step by step, while the mongrels came closer and closer. When her hand could touch the car bonnet, she dashed into the car, slamming the door shut after her. The dogs rushed forward and jumped, bouncing off the car door, growling and barking furiously. Their plan had failed. The next second, the car drove off, leaving the pack far behind.

In the car, Mei stared blankly ahead. Slowly, she looked down and saw her hands on her lap. They were shaking.

"Are you okay, Miss?" The driver repeated his question a few more times before Mei turned to look at him. At the sight of the young man, she was hit by the sudden realisation that she was in a stranger's car!

"You don't look so well. Can I send you home?" he offered.

"Oh no, no need," Mei promptly responded, now highly suspicious of the stranger seated next to her. For her to continue this ride, much less for Mother to see her arrive home in a stranger's car, was completely unthinkable. Squirming uneasily on the passenger's seat, Mei's stomach started to feel queasy.
