Did you know who made the first...

...hamburger?

In the 19th century, meat patties were made in Hamburg, Germany. German immigrants arrived in the United States, bringing with them the Hamburg meat patties. A creative cook later put the patty between two slices of bread, and the Hamburg sandwich was born. This later evolved into the hamburger.

...ice cream?

Around 500 BC, the Persians served flavoured ice. In about 200 BC, the Chinese ate a milk and rice mixture frozen in snow. Around 37 AD, the Romans collected fresh snow and ate it with fruit. Ice cream recipes first appeared in England in the 18th century.

...fruit juice?

In the 16th century, lemonade appeared in Italy as an import from the Middle East. Orange juice appeared in the 17th century. In 1869, Thomas Welch developed a method to store grape juice for a longer time. The juice was boiled at a low temperature to kill bacteria. This method prevented the juice from fermenting into alcohol.

...pancake and waffle?

The earliest pancake was made by the Romans in the 1st century. By the 15th century, many European countries made their own versions of pancakes. Waffles were developed in France and England around the 13th century.

BOOKLET B

Section I: Comprehension (Open-ended) 20 marks

Read this passage and answer questions 71 to 80.

A gentle breeze wafted through the park as the sun shone brightly in the summer sky. Nick heard screams from a group of party guest as he grilled sausages at a friend's birthday party at the beach. As he ran to investigate, he soon saw what was wrong. "Look! There are two boys in a rowboat caught in the current! They are being pulled out to sea!" a lady exclaimed.

Two brothers, Ryan and Tom, who had been at the party earlier, had climbed into a rowboat nearby and rowed out to retrieve a football which had landed in the waters. Once they paddled beyond the calm waters of the cove a beach umbrella tied to the rowboat caught the wind and tugged the rowboat into open waters. The pair panicked and tried to row back to shore, putting their best effort to fend off the wind and currents. However, they were no match for the elements and spun helplessly in circles. Tom grabbed the oars tightly and paddled hard against the current. "Quick, keep rowing!" yelled Ryan. Anxiety and fear were clearly evident in his voice.

Nick immediately sprinted to the furthest point of land. The rowboat was a dot on the horizon. He knew that the rowboat was no match for the crashing waves. Acting on instincts, Nick jumped into the water immediately.

After thirty minutes of battling the current, he was close enough to yell to the boys, "Take down the umbrella!" Ryan wrestled with the tangle of rope that held the umbrella. Finally, he uncoiled them and freed it. At that moment, Nick finally caught up and climbed aboard the rowboat. Nick took over the rowing but the waves and current were too strong for him. "Let's aim for the pier!" Tom suggested, pointing to a dock a distance away. Nick turned the vessel towards it. However, waves crashed over the flimsy rowboat and it began to sink. "Can you boys swim?" he cried. "A little bit," the boys replied.

Once they were in the waters, Nick decided it would be safer and faster for him to pull the boys towards the pier as both boys were wearing life jackets and floating on their backs. Nick held the tops of their life jackets in one hand and side-stroked with the other arm towards land. Fearful, the boys floated as Nick steered them to safety.

He swam bravely as water washed over the boys' faces. Finally, half an hour later, they reached the pier. The boys scrambled up the metal beam to the dock, relieved that they had reached safely. The three of them huddled there till a Coast Guard boat picked them up and took them to a waiting ambulance. Nick, although exhausted from his exertions, greeted the boys' parents with a smile when they finally arrived at the hospital. The boys, upon seeing the furious look on their father's face, they knew they were in for it. A wave of regret washed over them as they hung their heads low.

Although the boys' father was angry with the boys' foolish act, he was extremely grateful to the man who had risked his life to save his sons. He told Nick repeatedly, "You are a hero."
