Section G: Comprehension (Short Response)

Read the passage carefully and answer questions 35 to 40. (8 marks)

In the animal kingdom, tails serve many different functions and purposes. For many animals, tails are used for balance. Dinosaurs, like the Tyrannosaurus-rex, used their tails to balance their heavy heads and bodies while walking on two legs. Kangaroos use their tails for balance while leaping, and their tails also function as a third leg that helps them to lift off into the air. Climbers like monkeys use their tails for balance and to grip vines and branches.

Some animals have evolved tails into weapons for defence. Stingrays have a spiked tail that they can use to defend against predators. When attacked, they whip around their spiked tails and release venom from them. Rattlesnakes have dried skin on their tail that make a rattling sound to scare off potential predators.

Lastly, animals that live in groups, like dogs and wolves, use the positions of their tails to indicate their rank and communicate with one another. Dogs wag their tails when excited, which is a form of communication with humans too.

Tails serve different functions for animals across different species. Tails have become an essential part of animals' survival as they have various uses, such as balance, defence and communication.

Section H: Comprehension (Short Response)

Read the passage carefully and answer questions 41 to 45. (8 marks)

It was a quiet Sunday morning on the train. The few passengers aboard were either reading the newspaper or dozing in their chairs. The train stopped as it reached the station, and a father with several young children came on board.

Within seconds, chaos broke out. The father settled into a seat, while his children ran up and down the carriage, screaming and wrestling each other on the floor. The silence in the train disappeared, and it was replaced by the children's loud and messy screams.

The father did nothing.

Time ticked by. Those who were originally dozing were now awake because of the children's screams. Many turned their eyes towards the direction of the noise and gazed angrily at the father, their minds filled with anger and frustration. Some even began grumbling about how annoying the noisy children were.

Finally, unable to bear the disturbance any longer, a well-dressed businessman walked up to the father. Grabbing his shirt collar, the businessman shouted angrily, "Put your children in order immediately!"

The father looked up, tears welling in his eyes. In broken words, he said, "We just left the hospital... Their mother is very sick and I am not sure how to tell it to them. I don't know what to do."

Silence fell upon the carriage. The businessman, stunned by the father's response, released his grip.

"I... I'm so sorry. Can I help with anything?" the businessman apologised. Without waiting for a reply, the nearby passengers who overheard the commotion sprang into action. Some held the young, crying children in their arms to calm them down, while others read books to the older ones to quieten them. From being angry and frustrated with the father, the passengers felt sorry for him.
