Cats love boxes, regardless of the shape. Scientists do not fully understand why cats have a preference (16) for boxes but they have a few theories. The most popular one is that cats are naturally (17) drawn to boxes because boxes offer security and shelter.

Researchers have found a significant (18) difference between the stress levels of cats that had boxes and those that did not. The cats with boxes became accustomed to their surroundings faster and were more interested in interacting with humans.

Another theory why cats love boxes is because boxes keep them warm. Compared to humans, cats prefer warmer temperatures. That could be why cats love to curl up in confined (19) spaces, such as inside a box. It helps them to preserve (20) their body heat. It is no wonder then that cats are never far away from boxes.

Long ago in a faraway city, there were two beggars who wandered the streets each day collecting coins. When they passed _____ (29) the palace, the queen often gave each of them a loaf of bread. _____ (30) fail, the beggars would give the same responses. "Oh Queen! You are so kind _____ (31) generous," said the young beggar. "Praise be to God, who _____ (32) been generous to the queen," said the old beggar.

Day after day, the words of the old beggar annoyed the queen. One night, she devised a plan that _____ (33) teach the old beggar to give thanks to her instead. She instructed the baker _____ (34) hide jewels in a loaf of bread. The next day, she gave a plain loaf to the old beggar and carefully handed the one _____ (35) the jewels to the young beggar. Smiling, the queen walked away.

"This loaf is too heavy - it must be poorly baked!" thought the young beggar, _____ (36) noticing the weight of his bread. He turned to the old beggar and asked if he would exchange loaves. Eager to _____ (37) helpful, the old beggar agreed. When the queen learnt _____ (38) the exchange, she was displeased. Her plan had failed miserably.

sleeping at some void deck or staircase landing in Singapore. Many of these people lie on peices of cardboard.

(40) [ ]

A nationwide studying on the homeless in Singapore indicated that most of them

(41) [ ] (42) [ ]

are poor and have weak sosial support. The pliight of these homeless people deeply sadened Mr Yeo. In July 2014, he founds the organisation called 'Homeless Hearts'.

(43) [ ] (44) [ ]

The mission of the organisation is to help the homeless people be part of the comuniity again. Every fortnight, a team of dedicated voluntiers from 'Homeless Hearts'

(45) [ ] (46) [ ]

(47) [ ] (48) [ ]

conduct night walks in various parts of Singapore. They begin by give food and drinks to the homeless whom are sleeping in the street. Then, they sit and talk to them as friends.

(49) [ ]

(50) [ ]

"The homeless are not just a problem to be solved. They are people to be love. Many of them are actually in need of a friend," said Mr Yeo.

Beyond helping the homeless with necessities, building a relationship with them is also important.

How did the early humans figure out which food was edible? How did they know which food was _____ (51) ? To understand the evolution of food, we have to travel _____ (52) in time to thousands of years ago.

Early humans lived as hunters and gatherers. They moved from place to place daily, hunting animals and _____ (53) plants for food. Day and night, they were _____ (54) search of food and this practice left them with _____ (55) time to do other activities. Finding food _____ (56) a time-consuming and an energy-draining task, not to _____ (57) dangerous. If they were not injured by animals _____ (58) a hunt, there was always the _____ (59) of starvation when food was scarce.

Over the years, gatherers used trial and _____ (60) to decide which plants were edible. They _____ (61) note of the plants that the animals were eating and followed suit. Should one person _____ (62) sick after eating a plant, they quickly learnt not to eat that plant ever again. Gradually, they also discovered that many poisonous plants could cause the tongue to sting – that was a warning sign not to _____ (63) it, but to spit it out.

Many of these hunters and gatherers eventually settled down as farmers when they learnt to raise animals and grow crops. They no longer needed to move _____ (64) searching for food. With more time on _____ (65) hands, they began exploring ways to make their food taste better. It was then that cooking was invented and different cultures developed their own unique ways to prepare food.

Read this passage and answer questions 71 to 80. (20 marks)

My best friend had gone for lunch with the most popular girl in class, so I ate my tuna sandwich alone in the library. During dance class, my partner, a boy, refused to hold my clammy hand and called me names for the rest of the day. It was, without a doubt, my worst day in school.

None of this had anything to do with Mother and yet, I was terrible to her that afternoon. I was hurt and mad, and looking for a target to vent my anger on. Mother had baked peanut butter cookies and piled them up on a plate when I got home from school. She had artfully decorated each one with royal icing and sprinkled sugar over it.

"Couldn't you have made chocolate chip?" I said. My eyebrows furrowed. Mother popped her head out from the laundry room. "I could have," she replied, "but I made peanut butter ones. Eat them while they're still hot, Heidi." Although I thought Mother was rather unthoughtful, I caved in and took a few bites in the end.

That evening, when she pulled a grilled chicken from the oven, I sulked again. Never mind that Mother had busied herself the whole afternoon with the cooking just to put this hot meal on the table. I wanted hamburgers.

"Nobody even likes that kind of food, Mum! Why didn't you make hamburgers?" I grumbled. Mother heaved a deep breath and ran her fingers through her dishevelled hair. "You've never complained about having it before," she said matter-of-factly. It all went downhill from there. I growled and complained incessantly until Mother hit her limit. We had a shouting match in the hallway.

"No dinner for you! Go to bed now!" she roared. I spun around and stomped to my bedroom.

Plopping on my bed, I screamed and sobbed into my pillow. All that crying released my pent-up anger. As I calmed down and my breathing became regular, the day's events began to unfold in my mind. A sharp pang of guilt hit me. Why had I taken my troubles out on Mother? If I had shared about my woes, Mother would have listened. The more I thought about my actions, the heavier my heart felt.

Then, I heard strange rumbling and clanking sounds coming from the kitchen. Puzzled, I shimmied out of my bed and opened my bedroom door. A thick, juicy scent of hamburgers wafted into my nose as I walked down the hallway. I rounded the corner and was greeted by a plate of freshly grilled hamburgers on the kitchen table. Upon seeing me eye a bottle of tomato sauce, Mother tilted it in my direction and asked, "Want some?" I pushed the plate away sheepishly.

Tears welled up in my eyes. "Mom, I've been awful to you today. I had a bad day at school... I'm sorry. I don't deserve this, I'm sorry," I sobbed.

"You're in a tough spot, Heidi. I remember those growing up years. I forgive you," Mother smiled and gave me a bear hug.

That night, I should have been punished. Instead, Mother dished up a hearty portion of grace.
