Mae sprinted out of the left field and slammed into Jon before he could run away. Jon fell and Mae piled on top of him. It was a spectacular tackle for a rugby game. I cheered.

In the midst of the struggle for the rugby ball, another player attacked Mae and she fell. The cheer was stuck in my throat. After a few moments, Mae got up and continued the game. I heaved a sigh of relief.

When Mae, my 13-year-old daughter, first asked if she could play rugby, I was terrified. Personally, I did not like the sport because the game was violent and it had the highest injury rate of all school sports. That was why I told her she could not do it.

However, Mae wanted to play rugby so much that she kept asking for my permission whenever I said no. That needed a huge amount of courage. Mae was not fragile. She was athletic and tall for her age at 170 centimetres. She told me that her height was an advantage in the sport. If she were to wait till she turned fifteen, the boys would tower over her and be stronger than her. She argued that it might be the only chance for her to do well in this sport.

Touched by her determination to do something that was difficult, I gave in eventually. After watching all the matches she had played in, I had to admit that it was a good experience for her. I just hoped that my presence at her games would encourage her and let her feel supported. I was proud of her for not giving up the sport that she loved despite all the challenges.

Comprehension 2

Read this passage and answer questions 38 to 43. (8 marks)

There was once a kingdom inhabited only by birds. It was a peaceful kingdom ruled by a king and a queen, both nightingales, who were much loved for their kindness and compassion. They were happy but not perfectly so. Something was missing in their lives.

One spring morning, the queen laid a smooth and glossy egg. The couple were overjoyed and felt their lives were finally complete. The king hovered around as the queen tenderly cared for the egg and kept it warm. The egg hatched and a beautiful baby was born. She was named Sophia.

To the adoring parents, Sophia was perfect in every way. However, a wise old bird pulled them aside and told them, "Something is not right. Her left wing is withered. She could never fly. We must bind her withered left wing tightly to her body to protect it!"

The king and the queen were alarmed by the old bird's observation and decided to bind Sophia's wing. However, the binding pained the little bird. The queen witnessed it and could not bear to hear her cries, so she eventually unwrapped the wing.

As Princess Sophia grew, she became kind and loving, just like her parents. Sad and broken birds of all kinds came to her to be comforted by her sweet embrace. Although she had only one good wing, she never failed to wrap both – one frail, one strong – around her visiting friends to make them feel better.

Day by day, Princess Sophia noticed her left wing getting stronger. One day, she fluttered with all her might. She felt herself lift a few centimetres off the ground. Suddenly, she felt a surge of warmth flow through her left wing. She slowly opened both wings to their full expanse and soared away into the blue sky.
