Text 2

The extract below is taken from an article about fruit bowls.

Purchasing fruit bowls as a replacement for desserts such as cakes and ice cream has been a growing trend in recent years. When customers see fruit bowls filled with different types of fruit, they may believe that fruit bowls are healthy. As such, they tend to consume fruit bowls frequently, without thinking twice. However, even though fruit bowls are widely advertised to be healthy desserts, they may not be as wholesome as they are made out to be.

While fruits are rich in vitamins and nutrients, they contain natural sugar. Some fruits like mangoes, bananas and grapes are high in calories, and an excessive intake may lead to weight gain. On top of that, some places add sugar to enhance the taste of the fruit bowls they serve. With that information in mind, eating any dessert, even fruit bowls, in moderation is a wiser choice.

Capybaras visit hot springs during the cold and dry winter season in Japan. _____ (6) animals can be found in hot springs across Japan, sitting as still as statues in hot waters. Some scientists wanted to prove that capybaras truly enjoy the experience, so they decided _____ (7) carry out a study. They photographed a group of nine capybaras carefully as _____ (8) bathed in a hot spring for three weeks. Whenever the capybaras first _____ (9) the hot spring, a photograph would be taken of their faces above water level. This step was done _____ (10) after thirty minutes. Both sets of images would then be compared to find out if there were _____ (11) changes in two of their features.

If their ears were pinned back and if their eyes were closed after thirty minutes, the scientists would record them as having attained _____ (12) state of bliss due to the hot spring water. The opposite would be true if their ears were facing the front and if their _____ (13) were wide open. Such a display would mean that the capybaras were _____ (14) feeling blissful.

An important difference was seen _____ (15) the pictures taken before and during their baths. With the passing of _____ (16), their eyelids would droop low, almost fully closed. _____ (17), the position of their ears remained unchanged. Due to this observation, the study could not actually prove that capybaras truly enjoy their hot spring baths. Interestingly, the scientists noticed that each capybara had soft and smooth skin _____ (18) soaking in the hot spring. This finding led the scientists to encourage people to visit hot springs to _____ (19) their skins soft and smooth too. The scientists said that _____ (20) the hot springs were so good for the skin of the capybaras, people should visit the hot springs for the same reason. Truly, Japan is known for promoting its hot springs for their many health benefits.
